

Summary

A technique for the ruminal fistulation of cattle which requires minimal surgical instruments is described. This reduces the possibility of ruminal infection and permits later healing of the fistula. Nevertheless, the technique does not permit immediate use of the fistulated animal in grazing trials.