

Summary

This study was carried out in the Universidade Federal de Viçosa, MG, Brazil, in April-May and October-November, 1985. The objective was to know the relationships between two sampling methods: visual estimation and direct sampling for botanical composition and dry matter yield for each component studied. Linear regression analysis showed high relationships between the two methods evaluated. The visual estimation showed to be efficient to evaluate those parameters for all the components studied.